

Autism is a reason for inappropriate behaviors – but it is not an excuse.

Autism spectrum disorders (ASD) often cause behaviors that are socially inappropriate. But parents and other caregivers can learn how to teach these skills effectively in order to promote a better life for their child, and for the rest of the family.

Socially inappropriate behavior prevents children with autism spectrum disorders (and their parents) from benefiting from:

- ❑ Togetherness and relaxation at home due to eating, toileting, sleeping issues
- ❑ Friendships in school and neighborhoods due to peer responses to inappropriate behavior
- ❑ Recreation (i.e. Boy Scouts, play dates) due to anxiety, behaviors, lack of supervision
- ❑ Babysitters/childcare – who lack experience, want the 'easy' kids, etc.
- ❑ Holidays/family functions due to crowds, foods, noise, etc.
- ❑ Vacations, due to change of schedule or new experiences
- ❑ Outings (i.e. the mall, the beach) due to safety or possible tantrums

Come and learn how to:

- Find the causes of behavior
- Create structure
- Create flexible thinking
- Teach skills
- Manage anxiety and stress

These strategies apply to children with ASD of all ages

There are no quick fixes, but when parents understand the causes of behaviors and how to teach the skills their children need, the entire family benefits.

Families cannot depend solely on educators to teach their children appropriate behaviors. Teachers only have access to children for about 1080 hours a year (the majority of which is devoted to academics). Families have them for the remaining 3240 hours.

About The Autism Project:

The Kennedy Center has committed to expand services, resources, and supports to families of children with an autism spectrum disorder. Toward that end, the agency has initiated The Autism Project, which is designed to increase and develop services and supports for children, youth, adolescents, and young adults - birth through 21 years of age.

About the Presenters:

Stacy Hultgren is The Autism Project Manager in the Children's Services Division of The Kennedy Center. She has an adult child with autism, and was the Co-Director of the CT Autism Spectrum Resource Center for 7 years. She has extensive experience working with families, schools, and other service providers involved with the autism spectrum.

Nicole Rivera, M. Ed., is a Senior Community Behaviorist and Autism Specialist at The Kennedy Center. She has worked in the field of special education for 10 years and specifically with individuals on the spectrum for 8 years. She was the supervisor for a private school for children on the spectrum and works as a special education consultant throughout Fairfield County and in the greater Waterbury area.
